BOTTOM LINE UP FRONT

Approach the reset as a positive, professional fresh start, not a post-mortem. The CEO already identified the problem and chose to deal with you directly — that's a vote of confidence. Lead with transparency and preparation; the ten questions demonstrate you take the relationship seriously.

The framing

- Acknowledge the reset briefly, then look forward. The CEO knows what happened; dwelling on Bart adds nothing. A single line ("I'm glad we're dealing directly — let's build this on a clear footing") is enough.
- Lead with preparation. This whole package signals you've done serious, honest work. That is the trust-builder — far more than any reassurance.
- Be transparent about what you don't know. Presenting the ten questions (and this package's honest flaws) shows integrity — the opposite of Bart's approach, and exactly what rebuilds trust.

TRANSPARENCY IS THE STRATEGY

The Bart episode was about misrepresentation. Your entire differentiation as a partner is the opposite: verified facts, flagged unknowns, nothing overclaimed. Handing the CEO a package that openly says "here's what I've confirmed, here's what I need you to confirm" is the single most powerful trust signal available — and it's true.

What to bring to the conversation

The ten questions (this Pack), and a willingness to share the relevant parts of this package. You don't need to reveal every internal working note, but the transparency of the approach should be evident.

Implication

Handled well, the reset becomes a competitive advantage: a CEO burned by a dishonest partner meets a prepared, transparent one. That contrast does more for the relationship than any pitch.
